Last Meeting's Speaker: Professor Yvonne Sadovy Save the So Mei

Professor Yvonne gave us a very thorough walk through of the situation of the Napoleon Wrasse (Chinese: So Mei). Professor Yvonne also expressed that if anyone ever did scuba dive: meeting these Wrasse is a very cute encounter. They are very large and they have cute personalities too. And each Wrasse has unique facial markings. It is also transgender, it changes from female to male.

The market price of the Napoleon Wrasse is 250USD. The price tag makes the fish, a prime target for trafficking, particularly in Hong Kong and mainland China, where the fish is reserved for expensive banquets and dinners to display a host's high social status. Traditionally, banquet fish like the Napoleon wrasse are held in restaurant aquariums before they become a meal. Despite the Napoleon Wrasse endangered status, some Hong Kong establishments regularly stock the fish.

To pierce the world of shadowy suppliers, marine biologist Yvonne Sadovy has investigated a number of cargo ships over the past four years in an attempt to trace the fish's journey from reef to dinner plate. They are mostly caught using cyanide fishing - which is also bad for the environment. Hong Kong doesn't consider wildlife smuggling a serious crime. The domestic ivory trade will be banned, but not until 2021—lagging behind mainland China, which saw a complete ban at the end of March 2017. And despite public outcry, Hong Kong is still one of the world's biggest markets for shark fin soup, another high-status dish often made from endangered species. Yet, despite all this, Sadovy sees some hope for the Napoleon wrasse: there has been an increase in enforcement and prosecutions for illegal possession of the fish by the AFCD. The big fish with the rather gloomy expression may yet have something to smile about.

THE ONE 2019 was Subasini Mistry

Many years ago, Subasini's husband passed away at the young age of 35, unable to get the treatment he needed. Determined that no one should experience the same tragedy, she vowed to bring affordable and free medical treatment to all the villagers of Hanspukur.

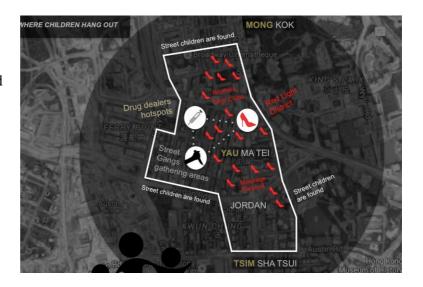

After twenty hard years of selling vegetables, cleaning houses, laying bricks and various odd jobs, Subasini finally saved enough to purchase a plot of land at Hanspukur. Thanks to the combined kindness of villagers who donated money and building materials, the Indian government who helped with construction, and doctors in residing areas who agreed to treat the needy, the Humanity Hospital opened in 1996.

Today, the hospital treats 450-500 out-patients daily and Subasini spends up to 18 hours a day supervising patient care and comforting the sick. She is living proof that those from humblest of origins can accomplish great deeds for society.

More about Vijay and Kitling's Charity:

Ultimate United Genesis: In May 2012, one of our friends invited us to visit a park in Yau Tsim Mong called Saigon Street Playground. This seemingly simple park visit changed our lives. That day, we met the children of different nationalities and from different socioeconomic backgrounds (single-parent homes, asylum seekers, refugees).

On our way home, we observed the surrounding areas. Nearby, there were sex toy shops, street prostitution, people openly drinking alcohol and smoking on the streets, In the handicap restroom in the public lavatory we saw used drug syringes.

We left the Yau Tsim Mong area feeling disheartened and distressed. We wondered about the children of Yau Tsim Mong - we wondered how a child's development is affected by such living environments. People living in subdivided flats do not live easy. For most of the Yau Tsim Mong youth: the streets, the neighbouring parks, and video parlours are their second homes. To use wifi, the children may often go to McDonald's or Community Buildings. All these underlying factors are contribute to the increased possibility of the children of Yau Tsim Mong getting involved in triads, having unwanted pregnancies, and dropping out of school.

Hence, the following week we came back to the Saigon Street Playground. We played games with the kids, they were very sweet, laughing and giving us hugs. The week after we went again to the playground, and since then we never stopped. We called our Friday gatherings with the kids our "Mission Bridge Friday Night Kids Club". Since 2012, we have consistently held our Mission Bridge Friday Night Kids Club every Friday from 7:00 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. At our Friday Night Kids Club we read to the children, play games, sing songs, and most importantly build foundational relationships with the children. To this date, we have served over 400 children of over 20 different nationalities. Currently our Kid's club has around 157 children.
